The Federal Judicial Conduct and Disability System: Unfinished Business for Congress and for the Judiciary

Abstract

For most of the nation’s history, the only formal mechanism for dealing with misconduct by federal judges was the cumbersome process of impeachment. That era ended with the enactment of the Judicial Councils Reform and Judicial Conduct and Disability Act of 1980 (1980 Act or Act). In 2002, Congress made modest amendments to the Act and codified the provisions in Chapter 16 of Title 28. In 2008, the Judicial Conference of the United States – the administrative policy-making body of the federal judiciary – approved the first set of nationally binding rules for misconduct proceedings.

Under the 1980 Act and the 2008 Rules, complaints of misconduct by federal judges are handled under a system that has aptly been described as one of “decentralized self-regulation.” That system is sound and does not require fundamental restructuring. At the same time, the experience of the past few years has revealed gaps and deficiencies in the regulatory regime that warrant attention. Some may be appropriately dealt with through revision of the judiciary’s 2008 Rules, but others should be addressed by Congress through changes to Chapter 16.

In this statement, submitted at a hearing of the House Judiciary Committee, the author suggests statutory amendments dealing with three aspects of the system: transparency and disclosure; disqualification of judges; and review of orders issued by chief judges and judicial councils. In each of these areas, the judiciary has promulgated rules that reflect sound policy but are in conflict or tension with statutory language. Moreover, these elements are more than procedural; they determine who makes the decisions and how much information the public receives. The author also suggests several steps that can be taken by the Judicial Conference without any further authorization by Congress. By implementing these suggestions, Congress and the judiciary can update Chapter 16 and the misconduct rules to reflect the best practices developed by the Judicial Conference and by individual judges over the years.

The statement is followed by an Appendix that includes transcripts of oral colloquies at the hearing as well as the author’s response to a written question from a member of the Judiciary Committee.

Statement of
Arthur D. Hellman

Chairman Coble, Ranking Member Watt, and Members of the Subcommittee:

Thank you for inviting me to express my views at this hearing on “An Examination of the Judicial Conduct and Disability System.”

In my view, the system of decentralized self-regulation established by Congress in 1980 is sound and does not require fundamental restructuring. At the same time, the experience of the past few years has revealed gaps and deficiencies in the regulatory regime that warrant attention. Some may be appropriately dealt with through revision of the Rules promulgated by the judiciary, but others should be addressed by Congress through changes to Title 28.

In this statement I suggest statutory amendments (and also some Rules changes) dealing with three aspects of the system: transparency and disclosure; disqualification of judges; and review of orders issued by chief judges and judicial councils. A common thread is that in each of these areas the judiciary has promulgated rules that reflect sound policy but are in conflict or tension with statutory language. Moreover, these elements are more than procedural; they determine who makes the decisions and how much information the public receives. The statement concludes by briefly flagging other issues that may warrant attention by Congress or the Judicial Conference.

Before turning to these matters, I will say a few words by way of personal background. I am a professor of law at the University of Pittsburgh School of Law, where I was appointed in 2005 as the inaugural holder of the Sally Ann Semenko Endowed Chair. I have been studying the operation of the federal courts for more than 30 years. I have testified at several hearings of the House Judiciary Committee on various aspects of judicial ethics, including the 2001 hearing that led to the enactment of the Judicial Improvements Act of 2002. My writings include two articles of particular relevance to today’s hearing. One is an overview of the regulation of federal judicial ethics. The other is an analysis of the current rules for judicial misconduct proceedings, adopted by the judiciary in the spring of 2008.²

I. Background

For most of the nation’s history, the only formal mechanism for dealing with misconduct by federal judges was the cumbersome process of impeachment. That era ended with the enactment of the Judicial Councils Reform and Judicial Conduct and Disability Act of 1980 (1980 Act or Act). This law created a regime that has aptly been described as one of “decentralized self-regulation.”³ Codified in a single subsection of the Judicial Code, it established a new set of procedures for judicial discipline and vested primary responsibility for implementing them in the federal judicial circuits. In 1990, Congress adopted a modest package of amendments to the statute.

In November 2001, the predecessor of this Subcommittee held an oversight hearing on the operation of the 1980 Act. Based on the record of that hearing, Chairman Coble and Ranking Member Berman introduced a bipartisan bill to further revise the statutory provisions governing the handling of misconduct complaints. In particular, the bill codified some of the procedures adopted by the judiciary through rulemaking; it also gave the misconduct provisions their own chapter in the United States Code, Chapter 16. The bill was signed into law as the Judicial Improvements Act of 2002.

Much has happened since the 2001 hearing. Two federal district judges were impeached by the House of Representatives. One resigned to avoid a Senate trial; the other was convicted and removed from office. Chief Judge Alex Kozinski of the Ninth Circuit was “admonished” by the Judicial Council of the Third Circuit for “possession of sexually explicit offensive material combined with his carelessness in failing to safeguard his sphere of privacy.”⁴ District Judge Manuel Real was publicly reprimanded by the Ninth Circuit Judicial Council for improperly interfering in a bankruptcy case – but only after protracted proceedings that included two dismissals of the complaint.\(^5\) Just this year, Senior District Judge Richard F. Cebull resigned from the bench after a Special Committee in the Ninth Circuit completed its investigation of Judge Cebull’s transmittal of an email containing racially offensive content.

Meanwhile, the regulatory landscape within the judiciary has altered considerably. In September 2006, a committee chaired by Associate Justice Stephen G. Breyer issued a detailed report on the implementation of the 1980 Act.\(^6\) The report included extensive commentary on key statutory terms; it also made recommendations to all of the principal actors in the misconduct process. Although the report does not have the status of law, it is treated as a primary document; chief judges and circuit councils look to its analysis for guidance in handling misconduct complaints.

In March 2008, the Judicial Conference of the United States, the administrative policy-making body of the federal judiciary, approved the first set of nationally binding rules for dealing with accusations of misconduct by federal judges.\(^7\) These Rules replaced the Illustrative Rules promulgated by the Administrative Office of United States Courts in 2000.\(^8\) All of the circuits have now adopted the 2008 Rules.

Against this background, the time is ripe for a fresh look at the operation of the federal judicial misconduct statutes. I applaud the Subcommittee for initiating the process by holding this hearing.

II. Perspectives on Chapter 16

Before turning to the specifics, I offer three general observations to provide some context for my suggestions.

\(^{5}\) See In re Committee on Judicial Conduct & Disability, 517 F.3d 563 (U.S. Jud. Conf. Comm. on Conduct & Disability 2008). The conduct that led to the reprimand was also the subject of an impeachment hearing by the predecessor of this Subcommittee.

1. Judicial disability. When Congress established procedures for handling complaints against federal judges, it made no distinction between complaints alleging misconduct and complaints alleging “mental or physical disability” that affects a judge’s ability to perform his or her judicial work. However, experience has shown that allegations of disability raise very different issues from allegations of misconduct. Concerns about a judge’s mental or physical decline are generally addressed through informal and totally private measures. Transparency is generally unnecessary and indeed harmful.

In this statement I shall focus primarily on misconduct. But I will note here that in revising the statute, care should be taken not to include mandates that would interfere with the ability of circuit chief judges to deal with disability in a quiet, compassionate, but effective way.

2. Routine and non-routine complaints. The vast majority of misconduct complaints do no more than challenge the merits of a judge’s ruling or make totally unsupported allegations of bias, hostility, or conspiracy on the part of one or more judges. The Breyer Committee, after careful study, found “no serious problems with the judiciary’s handling” of these routine complaints. I agree with that assessment. By the same token, I believe that Chapter 16 in its current form provides a generally adequate framework for dealing with the routine complaints. Some tweaking of the procedures may be desirable, but no more.

Non-routine complaints present a more complex picture – in particular, what the Breyer Committee called “high-visibility cases” – complaints “that have received national or regional press coverage, including matters that have come to the attention of (or been filed by) members of Congress.” These complaints are a tiny fraction of the total, but they are important out of proportion to their numbers, because those are the cases that shape public perceptions of whether the judiciary is adequately carrying out its responsibility to police misconduct within its ranks. In the high-visibility cases, the Breyer Committee found “an error rate of close to 30%,” which the Committee deemed “far too high.” The judiciary has taken steps to improve its handling of these cases, but more could be done, and some modest amendments to Chapter 16 could help.

3. Fine-tuning the 2008 Rules. The mandatory national Rules adopted by the Judicial Conference in 2008 draw heavily on the analysis in the Breyer Committee report. However, on two important points the Rules fall short of the Breyer Committee’s recommendations. First, the Rules do not adequately delineate the circumstances under which a circuit chief judge should “identify a complaint” to initiate the misconduct process. Second, the Rules do not sufficiently define the limited scope of the inquiry that the chief judge may undertake in his or her initial review of a complaint. There is no need to revise the statutory treatment of these matters, but I do think they should be addressed by the Conduct Committee and the Judicial Conference. I have discussed these points at length elsewhere and will not repeat the analysis here.9

III. Procedures under the Act and the Rules

To set the stage for discussion of the issues warranting attention by this Subcommittee, it will be useful to outline the current procedures for handling complaints against federal judges.

Under Chapter 16 and the implementing rules, the primary responsibility for identifying and remedying possible misconduct by federal judges rests with two sets of actors: the chief judges of the federal judicial circuits and the circuit judicial councils. A national entity—the Judicial Conference of the United States—becomes involved only in rare cases, and only in an appellate capacity.

There are two ways in which a proceeding may be initiated to consider allegations of misconduct by a federal judge. Ordinarily, the process begins with the filing of a complaint about a judge with the clerk of the court of appeals for the circuit. “Any person” may file a complaint; the complainant need not have any connection with the proceedings or activities that are the subject of the complaint, nor must the complainant have personal knowledge of the facts asserted. The Act also provides that the chief judge of the circuit may “identify a complaint” and thus initiate the investigatory process even when no complaint has been filed by a litigant or anyone else.

When a complaint has been either “filed” or “identified,” the chief judge must “expeditiously” review it. The chief judge “may conduct a limited inquiry” but must not “make findings of fact about any matter that is reasonably in dispute.” Based on that review and limited inquiry, the chief judge has three options. He or she can (a) dismiss the complaint, (b) “conclude the proceeding” upon finding that “appropriate corrective action has been taken or that action on the complaint is no longer necessary because of intervening events,” or (c) appoint a “special committee” to investigate the allegations.

9 See Hellman, Misconduct Rules, supra note 2, at 348-55. I will also note that the 2008 Rules are contained in a rather bureaucratic document, not easily navigable by the ordinary citizen. Some reorganization and restyling would be desirable.
From a procedural perspective, options (a) and (b) are treated identically. The statute can thus be viewed as establishing a two-track system for the handling of complaints against judges. What I call Track One is the “chief judge track;” Track Two is the “special committee track.” All but a tiny fraction of complaints are disposed of on the chief judge track.

If the chief judge dismisses the complaint or concludes the proceeding, a dissatisfied complainant may seek review of the decision by filing a petition addressed to the judicial council of the circuit. The judicial council may order further proceedings, or it may deny review. If the judicial council denies review, that is ordinarily the end of the matter; in Track One cases, the statute states that there is no further review “on appeal or otherwise.” However, the 2008 Rules provide for another level of review under limited circumstances. This innovation raises important issues that will be discussed in Part VI of this statement.

If the chief judge does not dismiss the complaint or conclude the proceeding, he or she must promptly appoint a “special committee” to “investigate the facts and allegations contained in the complaint.” A special committee is composed of the chief judge and equal numbers of circuit and district judges of the circuit. Special committees have power to issue subpoenas; sometimes they hire private counsel to assist in their inquiries.

After conducting its investigation, the special committee files a report with the circuit council. The report must include the findings of the investigation as well as recommendations. The circuit council then has a variety of options: it may conduct its own investigation; it may dismiss the complaint; or it may take action including the imposition of sanctions.

Final authority within the judicial system rests with the Judicial Conference of the United States. A complainant or judge who is aggrieved by an order of the circuit council after a special committee investigation can file a petition for review by the Conference; in addition, the circuit council can refer serious matters to 10 More precisely, Track Two is the “chief judge/special committee track.” For ease of reference I will use the shorter label.

11 See Breyer Committee Report, supra note 6, at 132.

12 The judicial council may refer petitions to a panel composed of at least five members of the council.

13 In fact, the statute says this twice. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 352(c), 357(c).

14 To my knowledge, the new review provision has not yet been invoked.
the Conference on its own motion. If the Conference determines that “consideration of impeachment may be warranted,” it may so certify to the House of Representatives.

Congress has authorized the Conference to delegate its review power to a standing committee, and the Conference has done so.\footnote{See 28 USC § 331; In re Complaint of Judicial Misconduct, 37 F.3d 1511 (U.S. Jud. Conf. Comm. to Review Circuit Council Conduct and Disability Orders 1994).} Until 2007, the committee was known as the Committee to Review Circuit Council Conduct and Disability Orders. The name was changed in 2007 in order to reflect the Committee’s more active role in overseeing the Act’s implementation; it is now the Committee on Judicial Conduct and Disability.\footnote{See Report of the Proceedings of the Judicial Conference of the United States, Mar. 13, 2007, at 5.} I refer to it in this statement as the “Conduct Committee.”

\section*{IV. Disclosure and Transparency}

The system of self-regulation established by Congress can work only if the public trusts the judges to resist the temptations of what the Breyer Committee called “guild favoritism” – “an inappropriate sympathy with the judge's point of view or de-emphasis of the misconduct problem.”\footnote{Breyer Committee Report, supra note 6, at 119.} This means that it is not enough that the judges carry out the task with rigor and impartiality; it is also necessary that their actions are seen as reflecting those qualities. In short, an effective system requires trust, and trust requires transparency.

Unfortunately, from the beginning, the administration of the Act has been characterized by a lack of transparency and a bias against disclosure. The 2008 Rules take some small steps in the direction of making the process more visible, and I applaud them for that. But they do not go far enough. Moreover, the statute itself bears some of the blame. I’ll look first at the rules governing disclosure, then at other aspects of transparency.

\subsection*{A. The nature and timing of public disclosure}

Except in the rare case where the Judicial Conference determines that impeachment may be warranted, Chapter 16 provides for only limited public disclosure in misconduct proceedings. Written orders issued by a judicial council or by the Judicial Conference of the United States to implement disciplinary action must be made available to the public. But unless the judge who is the subject of the accusation authorizes the disclosure, “all papers, documents, and records of proceedings related to investigations conducted under [Chapter 16] shall be confidential and shall not be disclosed by any person in any proceeding.” The statute is silent on the publication of chief judge orders dismissing a complaint or concluding a proceeding.

The judiciary’s rules have filled in some of the statutory gaps, but they too evince a bias against disclosure. The basic rule (part of Rule 24) is that orders entered by the chief circuit judge and the judicial council must be made public, but only “[w]hen final action on a complaint has been taken and it is no longer subject to review.” This directive is supplemented by a series of rules governing the disclosure – or more accurately the non-disclosure – of the name of the subject judge. Of particular importance, the rules specify two situations in which “the publicly available materials must not disclose the name of the subject judge without his or her consent”:

1. “the complaint is finally dismissed … without the appointment of a special committee;” or
2. “the complaint … is concluded under [§ 352(b)(2)] because of voluntary corrective action.”

(Emphasis added.) There is only one situation in which the judge’s name must be disclosed: when the judicial council takes remedial action (other than private censure or reprimand) after a special committee report. The overwhelming majority of complaints are dismissed without the appointment of a special committee, and a large proportion of the remainder are concluded based on corrective action. Thus, in all but a tiny fraction of cases, the publicly available materials will not identify the judge, and any explanatory memoranda may omit details that would enable a reader to find out who the judge is. Further, no orders of any kind will be made public until the proceedings have concluded.

18 28 U.S.C. § 360(a). As noted in the text, there is also a narrow exception for situations involving actual or potential impeachment proceedings.

19 See, e.g., In re Complaint Against a Judicial Officer, No. 07-7-352-55 (7th Cir. Judicial Council Sept. 30, 2008). The two-paragraph order informs us that the chief judge appointed a special committee, and the committee carried out an investigation. The committee recommended that complaint be “dismissed as factually unsubstantiated and/or concluded based
Is this policy sound? Consider first the cases in which the complaint is dismissed without the appointment of a special committee. The commentary has little to say about the rationale for the non-disclosure rule, but a somewhat fuller explanation can be found in the commentary to the Illustrative Rules. That commentary referred to “the legislative interest in protecting a judge from public airing of unfounded charges,” and said that “the [1980] law is reasonably interpreted as permitting nondisclosure of the identity of a judicial officer who is ultimately exonerated and also permitting delay in disclosure until the ultimate outcome is known.”

For purposes of today’s hearing, it is unnecessary to inquire into Congress’s intent in 1980; the question, rather, is whether the asserted interest in protecting judges from “public airing” should be given primacy over the interest in accountability. In the routine cases that make up the vast bulk of complaints, I think the tradeoff is a reasonable one, because neither interest is particularly strong. Take the typical case: the chief judge dismisses a complaint on the ground that the allegations are directly related to the merits of a decision. Is there really an injury to the judge’s reputation if this “unfounded charge[]” of misconduct receives a “public airing”? At the same time, however, it is hard to see any serious threat to accountability if the judge’s name remains undisclosed.

The calculus changes in what the Breyer Committee called “high-visibility cases” – cases that have received national or regional press coverage. A complaint filed against District Judge Charles A. Shaw in 2006 is illustrative. The complaint was based on a story in the St. Louis Post Dispatch reporting that Judge Shaw “urged the crowd [at a naturalization ceremony] to vote for a congressman who shared the stage.” The article noted that the Code of Conduct for federal judges says that judges should not endorse candidates for public office. The chief judge dismissed the complaint, saying that the judge’s statements did not constitute an “endorsement.” The order did not identify the judge.

20 Illustrative Rules, supra note 8, at 55.

21 In the interest of brevity, I will summarize my conclusions in this statement. For a more extended analysis, see Hellman, Misconduct Rules, supra note 2, at 357-59.

The accusations against Judge Shaw had already been aired in a major regional newspaper (including its website). Withholding his name from the dismissal order did not protect him from that airing; on the contrary, it obscured from the public the information that he had been exonerated. In this kind of situation, the policy of the Rules makes little sense.\(^{23}\)

The “voluntary corrective action” cases present more difficult questions. Typically, these are cases in which the accusation of misconduct has some foundation, but the judge apologizes, and on that basis the chief judge concludes the proceeding. One can argue that, at least where the chief judge finds that the accused judge has violated the Code of Conduct or other ethical norms, the public has a legitimate interest in knowing the identity of the judge. On the other hand, if the apology (or other corrective action) did not carry with it a promise that the order would not identify the judge, the judge might be less willing to acknowledge fault and apologize.\(^{24}\) That does not seem like a desirable outcome.

Of course, this implicit bargain makes sense only when the allegations have not received a “public airing.” If the underlying conduct has already been reported in national or regional news media, it is hard to see what is gained by withholding the judge’s name from the order. And including it allows the public to see that the judiciary has not swept the matter under the rug. Indeed, in this situation, chief judges today sometimes ask the apologizing judge to consent to being identified in the order.\(^{25}\)

In my view, the policy should be this: When the substance of a misconduct complaint has been reported in news media, there should be a presumption that orders arising out of that complaint will disclose the identity of the judge. The presumption would apply when the complaint is dismissed on the merits and also \(^{23}\) The point is also illustrated by the proceedings involving District Judge James C. Mahan of Nevada. The Los Angeles Times published a front-page article accusing Judge Mahon of giving favorable treatment to friends and associates without disclosing “his relationships with those who benefited from his decisions.” A special committee investigated the allegations and found no misconduct. The Ninth Circuit Judicial Council then dismissed the complaint in a brief, opaque order that did not identify the judge. In re Complaint of Judicial Misconduct, No. 06-89087 (9th Cir. Jud. Council Aug. 23, 2007) (on file with the author). The anonymity was broken by Judge Mahon himself a few weeks later when he told his hometown newspaper that he was “very heartened” by the findings of the investigation.

\(^{24}\) Perhaps this is what the Rules commentary means when it says: “Shielding the name of the subject judge in this circumstance should encourage informal disposition.”

when the proceeding is concluded based on corrective action. By the same token, in “high visibility” cases it will often be desirable to release interim as well as final orders.

I do not suggest that this policy be codified as part of Chapter 16. Rather, the statute should be amended to enable the judiciary to implement the policy (through rules or guidelines) without the constraints of the existing statutory provisions on confidentiality. The Judicial Conference has shown the way, in a provision that is new in the 2008 Rules: “In extraordinary circumstances, a chief judge may disclose the existence of a proceeding under these Rules when necessary to maintain public confidence in the federal judiciary’s ability to redress misconduct or disability.” Building upon that provision, here is one possible way of drafting the amendment (to § 360):

When necessary or appropriate to maintain public confidence in the federal judiciary’s ability to redress misconduct or disability, a chief judge, a judicial council, or the Judicial Conference may –

(1) disclose the existence of a proceeding under this chapter;

(2) make interim orders public; and

(3) disclose the name of the judge who is subject of an order made public under [section 360].

B. Making the process more visible

“Concern over public awareness of the Act,” the Breyer Committee observed, “is longstanding.” Addressing this concern entails two overlapping elements: the availability of the process must be made known to potential complainants, and the results of the process must be made known to all who are interested in the effective operation of the judicial system.

Thanks in part to stern prodding by the Breyer Committee, the federal courts now do a better job of publicizing the availability of the process. But improvement has been spotty. The Breyer Committee recommended that every federal court should display the complaint form and the governing rules “prominently” on its website – “that is, with a link on the homepage.” As of mid-June 2011, more than one-third of the district courts had failed to take this modest step toward greater visibility. A spot check in April 2013 suggests that little has changed since then. Perhaps the time has come to incorporate the Breyer Committee recommendation into the National Rules.

26 Breyer Committee Report, supra note 6, at 218.

Even less progress has been made in publicizing how the Act is administered. Here are some steps that might be taken.

1. Electronic posting of final orders

   The 2008 Rules provide that final orders disposing of a complaint “must be made public by placing them in a publicly accessible file in the office of the circuit clerk or by placing such orders on the court’s public website.” (Emphasis added.) It is difficult to understand why the Rule does not require, without qualification, that all final orders must be posted on circuit websites. The ubiquity of the Internet has changed the popular understanding of document availability; in today’s world, availability means “available online.” Yet today, only six of the 13 federal circuits post all misconduct orders on their websites.

   It is desirable in any event to codify the Rule provision requiring that all final orders (including those issued by the chief judge under § 352) be made public. That being so, there is every reason to include a requirement that the orders be posted on the court of appeals’ public website. This could easily be done by amending 28 U.S.C. § 360(b).

   One drawback of comprehensive posting is that orders of general public interest (e.g. those that interpret the Code of Conduct) are buried among the routine ones. The simple solution is to post the non-routine orders under a separate heading or on a separate page within the website.

2. Publishing orders with precedential value

   The 2008 Rules also provide: “If [misconduct] orders appear to have precedential value, the chief judge may cause them to be published.” (Rule 23(b); emphasis added.) If a misconduct order “appears to have precedential value,” that means that it will provide guidance to other judges in administering the Act. That is enough to warrant publication.

   The rule should also encourage chief judges and circuit councils to provide sufficient explanation in their orders to enable outsiders to assess the appropriateness of the disposition.

27 The E-Government Act of 2002 already requires all federal courts to provide access on their websites to “the substance of all written opinions issued by the court, regardless of whether such opinions are to be published in the official court reporter.”
3. Creating a national compendium of precedential orders

Two decades ago, the National Commission on Judicial Discipline and Removal, chaired by former Rep. Robert W. Kastenmeier, recommended that the judiciary develop “a body of interpretative precedents” that would enhance “judicial and public education about judicial discipline and judicial ethics.” The Breyer Committee renewed and elaborated upon this recommendation. But no such compilation has been made available on the federal judiciary’s public website.

The Breyer Committee’s report provides a good blueprint for the content and organization of the compilation, and I need only refer to it here.

4. A more detailed annual report on the Act’s administration

Congress has required the Administrative Office of United States Courts (A.O.) to include in its annual report a statistical summary of the number of complaints filed under the Act and their disposition. The Breyer Committee recommended refinements to that report, and the A.O. has complied. But the report is still confined to numbers.

I suggest that the judiciary supplement the statistical report with a narrative report that includes discussion of particular noteworthy complaints and their resolution. Models for such a report can be found in the annual reports issued by some state boards and commissions. The Minnesota Board on Judicial Standards provides “abridged versions” of cases to maintain confidentiality; the California Commission on Judicial Performance gives a wealth of detail.

The report should be signed by the chair of the Conduct Committee. And it should be posted as a separate document on the “Judicial Conduct and Disability” page of the Federal Judiciary’s website. Taking these steps would not only

\[\text{29} \text{ The 2008 Rules state that the Conduct Committee “will make available on the Federal Judiciary’s website … selected illustrative orders, appropriately redacted, to provide additional information to the public on how complaints are addressed under the Act.” But the only orders published on the website are five opinions of the Conduct Committee.}\]

\[\text{30} \text{ Breyer Committee Report, supra note 6, at 216-17. The Breyer Committee recommended that the precedential orders should be “published in broad categories keyed to the Act’s provisions, and … with brief headnotes.” I would add that the categories should also be keyed to provisions of the Code of Conduct for United States Judges.}\] enhance public understanding of the Act's administration; it would also show the judiciary’s commitment to policing misconduct within its ranks.

V. Disqualification of Judges

In opting for a system of judicial self-regulation, Congress decided that, as a general matter, federal judges can be trusted to investigate allegations of misconduct by their fellow judges and to impose discipline where appropriate. Plainly, however, there are some situations in which particular judges should not participate in particular misconduct proceedings. Unfortunately, Chapter 16 provides only limited guidance on when judges should disqualify themselves. The 2008 Rules have quite a bit to say about the subject, but some of their provisions are themselves problematic. I'll begin by looking at the statute, then turn to some of the issues that the statute does not address.

A. Disqualification of judges under investigation

Section 359(a) provides that a judge who is the subject of an “investigation” for misconduct or disability is not permitted to participate in specified governance activities within the judiciary. (The statute does not restrict participation in adjudicative activities.) Section 359(a) reads:

No judge whose conduct is the subject of an investigation under this chapter shall serve upon a special committee appointed under section 353, upon a judicial council, upon the Judicial Conference, or upon the standing committee established under section 331, until all proceedings under this chapter relating to such investigation have been finally terminated.

This provision raises four issues that warrant the Subcommittee’s attention.

First, the reference to “this chapter” in the opening phrase may be misleading. The only “investigation” authorized by Chapter 16 is an investigation by a special committee under § 353. But the reference in § 359(a) could be read as including the “limited inquiry” made by a chief judge under § 352. Thus, if the present phrasing is retained, I suggest replacing “this chapter” with “section 353.”

Second, the statute specifies that the disqualification continues “until all proceedings under this chapter relating to such investigation have been finally 31 Perhaps out of caution there should also be a reference to § 355, but it is highly unlikely that the Judicial Conference would be carrying out an “investigation” with an eye to possible impeachment unless a special committee had been investigating in the circuit.

terminated.” (Emphasis added.) This appears to mean that disqualification would not be required if the investigation has moved to Congress for consideration of possible impeachment. I believe that if disqualification is appropriate while the judiciary is investigating possible misconduct, it should continue during the pendency of related proceedings in Congress. Rule 18 of the Illustrative Rules offers an alternative formulation that eliminates any ambiguity. Using it as a model, § 359(a) would read:

   Upon the appointment of a special committee under section 353, the judge who is the subject of the investigation shall not serve upon [the specified bodies] until all proceedings relating to such investigation have been finally terminated.

Third, there is a question as to the scope of the disqualification mandated by § 359(a). The statute says that a judge who is the subject of a special committee investigation shall not “serve … upon a judicial council, [or] upon the Judicial Conference.” But the 2008 Rules provide that the subject judge is disqualified “from participating in any proceeding arising under the Act … as a member of … the judicial council of the circuit [or of] the Judicial Conference of the United States.” (Emphasis added.) The commentary confirms that under the Rule the disqualification “relates only to the subject judge’s participation in” misconduct proceedings; it does not “disqualify a subject judge from service of any kind on each of the bodies mentioned.”

I believe that § 359(a) does “disqualify a subject judge from service of any kind on each of the bodies mentioned.” On that reading, the new Rule is in direct conflict with the statute. But Congress can amend the statute to conform to the Rule; the question for this Subcommittee is whether it should.

The commentary to the Rule gives two reasons for limiting the disqualification to misconduct proceedings:

[The broader] disqualification would be anomalous in light of the Act’s allowing a subject judge to continue to decide cases and to continue to exercise the powers of chief circuit or district judge. It would also create a substantial deterrence to the appointment of special committees, particularly where a special committee is needed solely because the chief judge may not decide matters of credibility in his or her review under Rule 11.

32 The drafters of the Illustrative Rules appear to have read the statute in the same way. See Illustrative Rules, supra note 8, at 56 (Rule 18(a)).
I am not convinced that these arguments, alone, carry the day. Ordinary judicial work is not likely to give rise to actual or perceived conflict with the judge’s interest as the subject of an investigation. And special committees are so few in number that the deterrence concern seems overstated.

Nevertheless, I agree that it makes sense to allow the judge who is under investigation to participate in activities of the circuit council and the Judicial Conference that are unrelated to misconduct proceedings. The rationale for disqualification is that participation would give rise to an actual or apparent conflict of interest. When the council or the Conference is dealing with matters outside the realm of misconduct – matters such as budgets, space allocation, or personnel – there is little risk of such a conflict.

This analysis applies only to the judicial council and the Judicial Conference. Special committees and the Standing Committee deal only with misconduct matters, so the disqualification should be comprehensive.

Taking all of these points into account, I suggest that § 359(a) be redrafted as follows:

Upon the appointment of a special committee under section 353, and until all proceedings relating to the investigation have been finally terminated, the judge who is the subject of the investigation –

(1) shall not serve upon a special committee appointed under section 353 or upon the standing committee established under section 331; and

(2) shall not participate in any proceeding arising under this chapter as a member of the judicial council of the circuit or as a member of the Judicial Conference of the United States.

Finally, the statute does not address the question whether a circuit chief judge should be permitted to carry out his or her responsibilities under Chapter 16 while he or she is the subject of a special committee investigation under § 353. As far as I know, this situation has arisen only once since the procedures were established more than 30 years ago. But if Congress thinks that the answer is “no,” the statute should be amended accordingly.

I believe such an amendment would be desirable. First, it is unseemly for a judge whose own conduct is under investigation for possible violation of ethical norms to be passing judgment on other judges who have been accused of misconduct. Second, as the Rules commentary states in a related context, 33 Three separate complaints were involved.

“participation in proceedings arising under the Act … by a judge who is the subject of a special committee investigation may lead to an appearance of self-interest in creating substantive and procedural precedents governing such proceedings.” 34 And there is no way of telling in advance whether a particular misconduct complaint will raises issues that bear upon those involved in the chief judge’s own case.

For these reasons – and recognizing the rarity of the situation – I think it would be desirable to provide that, for the duration, the next-most-senior active judge will serve as acting chief judge for purposes of Chapter 16. Here is a possible way of putting this into the statute:

A circuit chief judge whose conduct is the subject of an investigation under section 353 shall not participate in the consideration of any complaint under this chapter until all proceedings relating to such investigation have been finally terminated.

B. Other disqualification issues

Section 359(a) deals only with the disqualification of judges who are under investigation by a special committee. It says nothing about disqualification issues that may arise in misconduct proceedings in other contexts. Nor does any other provision of Chapter 16. One might think that the general disqualification statute, 28 U.S.C. § 455, would provide the governing law, but by its own terms it does not; it applies to “proceeding[s],” and “proceeding” is defined to include “pretrial, trial, appellate review, or other stages of litigation.” (Emphasis added.) Misconduct proceedings are not “litigation.”

Rule 25 of the 2008 Rules contains a lengthy set of rules governing disqualification. Three provisions (in addition to the one dealing with judges who are the subject of a special committee investigation) warrant discussion here.

1. The general standard

Rule 25 of the 2008 misconduct rules begins by laying out the general standard: “Any judge is disqualified from participating in any proceeding under these Rules if the judge, in his or her discretion, concludes that circumstances warrant disqualification.” This standard contrasts sharply with the one codified in § 455(a) for “litigation”: a judge “shall disqualify himself in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned.” The courts have held that § 455(a) “adopts the objective standard of a reasonable observer” who is “fully informed of the underlying facts.”35 In addition, § 455(b) specifies several particular circumstances in which disqualification is required (e.g. financial interest).

Given the commands of § 455, it seems anomalous to say that a judge, when deciding whether to participate in considering a misconduct complaint against a fellow judge, should look only to “his or her discretion.” One would think that, if anything, the bar to participation would be higher than it is in the context of litigation. This is so for two reasons. First, as the Breyer Committee recognized, the Act’s system of self-regulation necessarily raises concerns about “guild favoritism.”36 Judges should therefore be especially vigilant to avoid the appearance of conflict. Second, a refusal to recuse in the context of litigation is generally subject to appellate review, while a refusal to recuse in a misconduct proceeding is generally not reviewable at all.

I do not think it is necessary to elevate the bar above that of § 455(a), but I do believe that the standard of § 455(a) should be applied in misconduct proceedings.37 This can easily be done by adding a provision modeled on § 455(a) to § 357.

2. Chief judge participation in council review in Track One cases

The pre-2008 Illustrative Rules contained a very strong prohibition against any participation by a chief judge in judicial council review of final orders issued by the chief judge under § 352. Rule 18(c) provided:

If a petition for review of a chief judge’s order dismissing a complaint or concluding a proceeding is filed with the judicial council pursuant to [§ 352(c)], the chief judge who entered the order will not participate in the council’s consideration of the petition. In such a case, the chief judge may address a written communication to all of the members of the judicial council, with copies provided to the complainant and to the judge complained about. The chief judge may not communicate with individual council members about the matter, either orally or in writing.

35 United States v. Bayless, 201 F.3d 116, 126 (2nd Cir. 2000).
36 Breyer Committee Report, supra note 6, at 119
37 The Conduct Committee takes the position that § 455 is “not a template for recusals in misconduct proceedings” because the latter “are administrative, and not judicial, in nature.” In re Complaint of Judicial Misconduct, 591 F.3d 638, 647 (U.S. Jud. Conf. Comm. on Judicial Conduct & Disability 2009). I do not think the “administrative” characterization responds to the points made above in the text.
The commentary acknowledged that the question of chief judge participation had “engendered some disagreement,” but it explained why the mandatory disqualification rule had been chosen: “We believe that such a policy is best calculated to assure complainants that their petitions will receive fair consideration.”

Surprisingly, in the 2008 national Rules, this policy was reversed. New Rule 25(c) provides explicitly when a petition for review is filed, “the chief judge is not disqualified from participating in the council’s consideration of the petition.” (Emphasis added.) There is no explanation for the change. 38

I believe that the policy of the Illustrative Rules is preferable. Congress decided that a complainant dissatisfied with a chief judge’s final order should have one level of review as of right. Prohibiting the chief judge from participating in that review preserves the independence of that second look. The policy of the Illustrative Rules also has the benefit of encouraging the chief judge to make sure that all relevant information is part of the formal written record. 39

I also believe that the disqualification rule should be incorporated into Chapter 16. There is a particular reason for this. The chief judge is, by statute, a member of the judicial council. (See 28 U.S.C. § 332.) It can be argued that the chief judge is therefore entitled to participate in all duties assigned by law to the council, including review of chief judge orders. This exception should therefore be specified by statute. Appropriate language can be drawn from Illustrative Rule 18(c).

3. Special committees and judicial councils

Rule 25(c) provides: “A member of the judicial council who serves on a special committee, including the chief judge, is not disqualified from participating in council consideration of the committee’s report.” There can be no legitimate objection to this rule. Unlike the chief judge, the special committee has no power

38 The initial draft of the national Rules, circulated for public comment in June 2007, retained the disqualification policy of the Illustrative Rules. The December 2007 draft, circulated after the public comment period, reversed the policy without explanation. Indeed, the commentary states (as it does in the final adopted version) that “Rule 25 is adapted from the Illustrative Rules.”

39 The policy of the Illustrative Rules – unlike the 2008 Rule – is also consistent with a Congressional directive whose substance has been part of the Judicial Code for more than a century: “No judge shall hear or determine an appeal from the decision of a case or issue tried by him.” 28 U.S.C. § 47. I do not suggest that this provision applies of its own force to misconduct proceedings, but I think that the underlying rationale does.
to enter orders. Its duties are to investigate, to report, and to make recommendations to the circuit council. It is not independent of the council, and there is no reason why a judge who has served on the committee should not participate in the council’s consideration of the committee’s report.

VI. Review of Chief Judge and Judicial Council Orders

Chapter 16 contains two – and only two – provisions authorizing review of orders issued by chief judges and judicial councils in misconduct proceedings. Review of chief judge orders is governed by § 352. That section, after defining the authority of the chief judge to screen and dispose of complaints, provides in subsection (c):

A complainant or judge aggrieved by a final order of the chief judge under this section may petition the judicial council of the circuit for review thereof.

Review of judicial council orders is governed by § 357. That section provides:

A complainant or judge aggrieved by an action of the judicial council under section 354 may petition the Judicial Conference of the United States for review thereof.

(Emphasis added.) Section 354 delineates the actions that a judicial council may take upon receipt of a report by a special committee. Nothing in section 354 (or elsewhere) provides for review of council orders in cases in which a special committee is not appointed – what I have called “Track One” cases.

Chapter 16 also contains two provisions precluding review. Section 352(c), after authorizing review in the language quoted above, adds:

The [circuit council’s] denial of a petition for review of the chief judge’s order shall be final and conclusive and shall not be judicially reviewable on appeal or otherwise.

This prohibition is repeated in § 357(c):

Except as expressly provided in this section and section 352 (c) [quoted above], all orders and determinations, including denials of petitions for review, shall be final and conclusive and shall not be judicially reviewable on appeal or otherwise.

Experience has revealed several flaws in the system of review created by these provisions. In the pages that follow, I outline the problems and suggest statutory amendments to correct them. The proposed amendments would:
clarify the scope of judicial council review of final orders of the chief judge in Track One cases;

provide statutory authority for limited Conduct Committee review in Track One cases, modeled after a novel provision in the 2008 Rules;

create a channel of review when complaints are identified by the chief judge, thus filling a gap in the statutory arrangements; and make two small organizational changes.

A. Judicial council review of chief judge final orders

Section 352(b) authorizes the chief judge to issue two kinds of final orders: he or she may “dismiss the complaint,” and he or she may “conclude the proceeding.” Section 352(c) authorizes judicial council review of these final orders, but it does not specify the nature or scope of the council’s authority when a petition for review has been filed. Rule 5 of the 2000 Illustrative Rules filled the gap. I believe that the substance of Illustrative Rule 5 should be incorporated into Chapter 16.

Rule 5 was quite simple and straightforward. In relevant part, it read:

The judicial council may affirm the order of the chief judge, return the matter to the chief judge for further action, or, in exceptional cases, take other appropriate action.

Each of the three elements of the rule warrants brief comment.

1. Affirmance. As reflected in the language quoted at the start of this discussion, § 352(c) and § 357(c) both refer to the “denial” of a petition for review. This is unfortunate. In the federal judicial system, the denial of review is associated with the Supreme Court’s certiorari jurisdiction. The certiorari jurisdiction is discretionary, and a denial of certiorari, as the Justices have said on numerous occasions, is not a decision on the merits. But there is widespread agreement that, as stated in the commentary to the Illustrative Rules, the circuit judicial council “should ordinarily review the decision of the chief judge on the merits, treating the petition for review for all practical purposes as an appeal.” That, indeed, is what the practice has been, both before and after the 2008 Rules:

40 Illustrative Rule 5 was superseded by Rule 19(b) of the new National Rules. However, for purposes of amending the statute, the simple language of Rule 5 is preferable to the elaborate specificity of Rule 19(b).
when a circuit council finds no error, it will generally affirm the chief judge’s order. Chapter 16 should be amended to codify this approach, and Illustrative Rule 5 supplies appropriate language to that end.

2. Returning the matter to the chief judge. Everyone appears to have assumed that if the council does not affirm the chief judge’s final order, it may return the matter to the chief judge with directions to reopen the proceedings in any way the council deems appropriate to the particular situation. New Rule 19(b) lists several specific actions that the council might direct the chief judge to take. Whether or not such detail is desirable in the Rule, it is certainly not necessary in the statute. The language of old Rule 5 – “may … return the matter to the chief judge for further action” – serves the purpose very nicely.

3. “Other appropriate action.” The two options listed thus far will suffice for the overwhelming majority of complaints. However, old Rule 5 also authorized the circuit council, “in exceptional cases, [to] take other appropriate action.” New Rule 19(b) retains this language. The commentary to the Illustrative Rule explained that this provision “would permit the council to deny review rather than affirm in a case in which the process was obviously abused.” And there may be other instances in which such authorization would be helpful. I would therefore incorporate it into the statute.

B. Conduct Committee review in Track One cases

As noted earlier, Chapter 16 states not once but twice that when a judicial council denies a petition for review of a chief judge’s final order under § 352, the denial of review “shall be final and conclusive and shall not be judicially reviewable on appeal or otherwise.” Nevertheless, the 2008 national rules authorize the Judicial Conference Conduct Committee to review council actions of this kind under limited circumstances.

I agree with the Judicial Conference that there should be some provision for review of judicial council orders affirming final orders of the chief judge under § 352. However, I believe that the availability of review should be somewhat broader than it is in the 2008 Rules. I also believe that the authority for this kind of review should be explicitly conferred by Congress by amendment to Chapter 16.

41 The council may direct the chief judge to conduct a further inquiry under § 352(a), to identify a complaint under § 351(b), or to appoint a special committee under § 353. (Note that the text of Rule 19(b) actually refers to the Rules that correspond to these statutory provisions.)
1. Background

The impetus for the new review provisions came from a controversial and protracted proceeding involving District Judge Manuel Real of Los Angeles.\(^{42}\) In brief: the Judicial Council of the Ninth Circuit affirmed the dismissal of a misconduct complaint, over a blistering dissent by Judge Alex Kozinski, and notwithstanding substantial evidence that Judge Real had engaged in misconduct.\(^{43}\) The complainant sought review by the Judicial Conference, but the Conduct Committee, by a vote of 3-2, determined that it had no jurisdiction.\(^{44}\)

Not long after that, the Judicial Conference and the Conduct Committee reached a different conclusion. They decided that in cases where a circuit council has affirmed an order dismissing a misconduct complaint, the Judicial Conference does have the authority to determine “whether [the] complaint requires the appointment of a special investigating committee.”\(^{45}\)

New Rule 21(b) implements this decision. It permits a dissatisfied complainant or subject judge to petition for review “if one or more members of the judicial council dissented from the order on the ground that a special committee should be appointed.” The Rule also provides for review of other council affirmance orders “[at the Conduct Committee’s] initiative and in its sole discretion.” In either situation, the Committee’s review is limited “to the issue of whether a special committee should be appointed.”

2. Availability and scope of review

It certainly makes sense to allow review as of right by the Conduct Committee when one or more members of the circuit council have dissented from affirmance of the chief judge’s order. The fact that even one Article III judge has expressed dissatisfaction with the status quo created by a circuit council decision is surely sufficient to justify a second look by the Conduct Committee. By the same token, however, there is no reason to limit review to cases in which the dissenter asserts that a special committee should have been appointed. Any dissent should be sufficient. And all such dissents are extremely rare, so concern about workload should not stand in the way.

I believe that review as of right should also be available in two other situations. The first is where the judicial council has affirmed an order concluding the proceeding under § 352(b)(2) rather than dismissing the complaint under § 352(b)(1). Typically, these are cases in which the accused judge has acknowledged violating ethical norms and has apologized. Such cases lie at or close to the line between conduct that warrants some kind of discipline and conduct that does not. Moreover, their numbers are small; for example, in SY 2012, only 8 complaints were “concluded,” compared with nearly 1,300 that were dismissed. Providing for review as of right would add little to the burdens imposed on the Conduct Committee.

Review as of right should also be available when the judicial council, in addition to affirming the chief judge’s dismissal order, has imposed sanctions upon the complainant. I would make an exception for orders that do no more than “restrict or impose conditions on the complainant’s use of the complaint procedure.” But when more serious sanctions are imposed upon a complainant (such as a public reprimand), an added level of scrutiny – by a group of judges outside the circuit – will provide some assurance that the sanctions are not excessive and were imposed through fair procedures.

What remains are unanimous orders of affirmance in cases where the chief judge has dismissed the complaint under § 352(b)(1). Rule 21(b) does not allow petitions for review in these cases, but it does authorize the Conduct Committee to engage in review “[at] its initiative and in its sole discretion.” I think it makes more sense to allow petitions but to make the review discretionary, with no requirement of an explanation when review is denied. For one thing, the open-ended review provision in the new Rule potentially puts the case in limbo while the Conduct Committee decides whether this is one of the rare instances in which it should exercise its discretion. For another, a petition for review can provide some guidance, however small, to aspects of the council decision that may be open to debate. And while it would be something of a burden for the 46 See 2008 Misconduct Rules, R. 10(a). The exception would not include orders that prohibit a complainant from future use of the procedure.

47 For a brief discussion of judicial council authority to impose sanctions, see infra Part VII.

Committee (or more accurately its staff) to sift through the many petitions for review, there would be no need to even look at the large number of cases in which no review is sought.

Putting all of this together, I suggest adding a provision to § 357 along these lines:

(1) A complainant or judge aggrieved by an order of the judicial council affirming a final order of the chief judge under section 352 may petition the Judicial Conference of the United States for review thereof.

(2) There shall be a right to review if –
   (A) one or more members of the judicial council dissented from the order; or
   (B) the chief judge concluded the proceeding in whole or in part under section 352(b)(2); or
   (C) the judicial council imposed sanctions on the complainant (other than an order imposing conditions on the complainant's use of the complaint procedure).

(3) In all other cases, review shall be at the sole discretion of the Judicial Conference.

C. Review of orders in “identified” complaints

On June 11, 2008, the Los Angeles Times published an article reporting that Chief Judge Alex Kozinski of the Ninth Circuit had “maintained a publicly accessible website featuring sexually explicit photos and videos.” Judge Kozinski immediately (and publicly) asked the Ninth Circuit Judicial Council to initiate proceedings under the then-new national misconduct rules. The Council construed his request as the equivalent of identifying a complaint of judicial misconduct under 28 U.S.C. § 351(b). The matter was transferred to the Judicial Council of the Third Circuit, which carried out an investigation and issued a lengthy memorandum opinion “conclud[ing]” the proceeding.

The Council decision was widely interpreted as a vindication of Judge Kozinski. For example, the Wall Street Journal’s Law Blog posted a story aptly summarized by its headline: A “Pleased” Kozinski Cleared of Wrongdoing. Several months later, however, the Judicial Conference Conduct Committee, in an opinion addressing a different complaint, stated unequivocally that the Third Circuit proceeding “resulted in a finding of misconduct.”

If the Conduct Committee had directly reviewed the Third Circuit Judicial Council decision, it would have made clear that it did not interpret the ruling as a vindication of Judge Kozinski. And it would have issued an opinion of its own that hopefully would have provided a less ambiguous denouement to the proceeding. The public would then have had a solid basis on which to evaluate the judiciary’s handling of the allegations. But because no complaint had been filed, there was no “complainant … aggrieved by the action of the judicial council” who could petition the Judicial Conference for review.

This episode points up a serious gap in the statutory scheme: when a misconduct proceeding is initiated by action of the chief judge rather than by the filing of a complaint, there is no provision for review of final orders of the chief judge or the judicial council (unless the person aggrieved by the order is the judge who is the subject of the proceeding). The gap is especially troubling because “identified” complaints often involve “high-visibility cases” like those discussed by the Breyer Committee.

Fortunately, a solution is at hand. It is suggested by a memorandum opinion issued by then-Chief Judge Doris Sloviter of the Third Circuit more than 20 years ago. Judge Sloviter received an anonymous complaint alleging that a judge allowed close relatives to practice before him and failed to disqualify himself when required to do so. She found that the allegations “would state a cognizable claim” under the Act, but she concluded the proceeding based on intervening 53 Of course, Judge Kozinski could have filed a petition for review, but having declared himself “pleased” with the result, he had no reason to do so.

54 Another example is the proceeding involving District Judge James C. Mahan of Nevada, discussed supra note 23. Although the newspaper story that triggered the investigation provided a wealth of detail to substantiate its allegations (including names, dates, and dollar amounts), the Ninth Circuit Judicial Council’s brief order dismissing the complaint failed to address any of the specifics. Outsiders thus had no way of assessing whether the matter had been handled properly. The Conduct Committee might have done a better job, but because the complaint had been identified by the chief judge, there was no one to seek review of the Judicial Council order.

events. She then noted that because the complainant was anonymous, the ordinary review process “may be pretermitted.” She therefore “invoke[d] a sua sponte petition for review” and directed the deputy clerk to send the relevant materials “to the members of the Judicial Council with the request that they follow the ordinary review procedure.” The Judicial Council did as she requested.

I believe that the equivalent of this procedure should be codified in Chapter 16. Here is some language that would accomplish the purpose:

[A] If the chief judge dismisses a complaint that has been identified under section 351(b) or concludes the proceeding on such a complaint, the chief judge shall certify the final order to the judicial council of the circuit for review in accordance with [the procedure specified for review of chief judge orders].

[B] When a judicial council issues a final order under section 354 on a complaint identified by the chief judge under section 351(b), the council shall certify the order to the Judicial Conference of the United States for review.

The latter provision could easily be modified to allow Conduct Committee review of Track One cases in which the circuit council has affirmed the chief judge’s final order disposing of an identified complaint.

D. Matters of statutory organization

In addition to these substantive amendments, two small organizational changes would make the statutes more user-friendly.

First, the provisions governing review of chief judge orders by the judicial council are now included in section 352, which outlines the powers and responsibilities of the chief judge in reviewing complaints. It would make sense to transfer these provisions (as modified) to section 357, so that all provisions for

56 Here is another possible formulation: “If, after identifying a complaint under section 351(b), the chief judge dismisses the complaint or concludes the proceeding, the chief judge shall certify the final order to the judicial council of the circuit for review in accordance with [the procedure specified for review of chief judge orders].”

57 The proposals in the text leave one gap. If, after accusations have surfaced in the news media, the accused judge (other than the chief judge of the circuit) files a complaint against himself or herself, there might not be an independent complainant who could file a petition for review. As far as I am aware, that situation has arisen only once in the history of the Act. It should not happen again if chief judges follow the recommendation of the Breyer Committee to make greater use of “their statutory authority to identify complaints when accusations become public.” See Breyer Committee Report, supra note 6, at 209, 245-46.
review of orders and actions in misconduct proceedings would be found in a single section.

Second, the important provisions delineating the role of the Judicial Conference of the United States – including the authority to delegate its review power to a standing committee – are buried in an unnumbered paragraph (one of nine) in section 331, which deals with a wide range of matters involving the Judicial Conference. I think that these provisions should be moved to a new section (§ 365) that would be part of Chapter 16.

VII. Other Issues

Here I flag a few other issues that may warrant attention by Congress or by the Judicial Conference and conclude with some observations about the institutional arrangements for dealing with matters of federal judicial ethics.

• Judicial disqualification and the “merits-related” exclusion. From the beginning, the judiciary has taken the position that “[a] mere allegation that a judge should have recused” is merits-related and thus not cognizable under the Act. But an improper failure to recuse, unlike other erroneous decisions a judge might make, is a violation of the Code of Conduct. Should this entire class of ethical infractions be excluded from the ambit of the misconduct procedures?

• “Corrective action” and the apology. As already noted, the Act authorizes the chief judge to “conclude the proceeding” upon finding that “appropriate corrective action has been taken.” The 2008 Rules, following the lead of the Breyer Committee, makes clear that “corrective action” must be “voluntary action taken by the subject judge.” Commonly, the “corrective action” is an apology. Should the apology be recognized as a distinct basis for concluding a misconduct proceeding?

• Sanctioning abusive complainants. Rule 10(a) provides that a complainant who has “abused the complaint procedure” (for example, by filing repetitive or frivolous complaints) may be restricted or even prohibited from filing further complaints. Before restricting the right to file, the circuit council must give the complainant an “opportunity to show cause” why the limitation should not be imposed.

58 See Breyer Committee Report, supra note 6, at 239.

59 Before restricting the right to file, the circuit council must give the complainant an “opportunity to show cause” why the limitation should not be imposed.
recent cases, the Judicial Council of the Ninth Circuit has gone further than restricting the right to file; it has issued a “public reprimand” of a lawyer complainant. Should Title 28 or the Rules be amended to explicitly authorize sanctions in addition to filing restrictions?

- Fear of retaliation. Four years ago, the Task Force on Judicial Impeachment heard wrenching testimony by two employees of the federal court in Galveston, Texas, who were subjected to abusive treatment by District Judge Samuel B. Kent. Initially neither employee reported the abuse because of fear of retaliation. The Judicial Conference has recognized the importance of “assuring that justified complaints are brought to the attention of the judiciary without fear of retaliation.” Various systems have been suggested, but I believe that the most important element is the visible, emphatic, public commitment by the chief judge of the circuit to addressing legitimate complaints and protecting complainants from any form of reprisal.

In addition to its many procedural suggestions, the Breyer Committee called upon the Judicial Conference to give the Conduct Committee “a new, formally recognized, vigorous advisory role” in guiding and counseling chief circuit judges and judicial councils in implementing the 1980 Act. The Breyer Committee also urged the Committee itself to consider “periodic monitoring of the Act’s administration.”

Implicit in these recommendations is a twofold judgment: first, that self-regulation of federal judicial ethics requires a somewhat greater degree of centralization than now exists; and, second, that it is desirable to have an entity within the judiciary whose single function is—and is known to be—that of strengthening judicial ethics and enhancing transparency.

The Rules adopted in 2008 take modest steps in the direction of implementing these ideas, but more could be done. In particular, the Conduct Committee could be given a robust, visible role in monitoring the administration of the Act by chief judges and circuit councils and interjecting itself where the regional actors fall short. Meanwhile, by amending the statute, Congress can

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Mr. Wheeler. You overcame the illuminating light, difficult to do sometimes up here. Thank you, sir.

We try to comply with the 5-minute rule as well, gentlemen.

Let me start, Judge Sentelle, with you. In your statement, you noted that the AO was instrumental in conducting investigations of allegations about fraud, waste, and abuse. If you will, summarize for us some of the more significant investigations the AO has undertaken, the sums involved, the corrective actions taken, and provide us with a sense of how many such investigations are currently underway.

Judge SENTELLE. I'm not sure I can give you sums involved in each instance.

Mr. COBLE. And you could follow up subsequently if you can't do it today.

Judge SENTELLE. Let me consult my notes here just one moment. In the Southern District of Ohio, there was an investigation ordered by the chief judge that engaged a local attorney to conduct the investigation, who found that a clerk employee had—a clerk of the court had engaged with an improper relationship with an employee. The clerk admitted the relationship and resigned.

The chief judge requested an audit of the procurement actions conducted by that clerk for a conference, which was also a topic in the allegation. The Office of Audit and the Administrative Office of the Courts, the AO, conducted an audit. They found only about $2,000 in improper payments, but they found it. So it was not a big instance—amount in that case.

During the AO's cyclical review of a defender program under the Criminal Justice Act attorney panel, concerns were raised by one colleague that another one on the panel was padding his reimbursement voucher. Notification of the allegations to the AO, the chief requested investigative assistance. The AO investigator conducted a review of the panel attorney's vouchers.

Now this one has a happy ending. They reviewed thousands of dollars worth of vouchers and found that the defense attorney had not been in that case padding his vouchers.

But there was an actual embezzlement investigation in the Northern District of Illinois based on allegations that an employee was making questionable purchases with the credit card of the court. At the request of the chief judge, the AO conducted an investigation.

The investigation determined that the employee had circumvented the court's procedures and embezzled approximately $35,000 in goods and funds. The AO referred the matter to the Department of Justice, and the employee ultimately pled guilty to the charge of embezzling Government funds.

That's three that are readily available. There are others, but fortunately, they're usually not big amounts of money. If we're doing it right, we're going to catch them when they're still pretty small, most of them.

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Judge.

Listen, let me start with Professor Hellman. Professor, what are the most important steps Congress and the judiciary can take to promote greater transparency in the processing of judicial mis-
Mr. HELLMAN. Is the microphone on? Yes.

I think that from the standpoint of transparency, there are two simple steps that I would like to see the judiciary take, and it doesn't need any further authorization. The Breyer Committee recommended that every district court should post on its—the homepage of its website a link to the forms and rules for misconduct. That has been done by a majority of the districts, a substantial majority. But there are some that are not yet in compliance, and I hope that Judge Scirica's committee will see to it that all districts are in compliance with that.

Second thing involves the publication of misconduct orders. Under the current rules, the circuit councils have the option of putting the rules on their websites, publishing them there, or making them available in the clerks' offices.

About half of the circuits now only make them available in the circuit's office. It seems to me that it's an easy call—these should be online. They should be available to everyone. Frankly, everyone will now see that most of them are, in fact, frivolous, unsubstantiated, and are handled in exactly the way that they should be.

So I think that by putting these orders in a place where people can readily see them, that will substantially enhance confidence in the judiciary's ability and willingness to police misconduct within it.

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Professor.

Mr. Wheeler, let us try. Will you try to beat the red light again, same question?

Mr. WHEELER. Well, I endorse what Professor Hellman said. I think that the court records in posting information about the Act, the rules and the forms, may be a little—my sense is it's a little better than he thinks it is if we just don't assume that the material has to be exactly on the home page of the court. But obviously, it should be available to everybody, readily available on the website.

As to the posting of orders, I also agree with him that it's a bit of a no-brainer that they be posted on the website, as opposed to simply available in the clerk's office. But I would—at the risk of sounding ungrateful, I'd go on to say because there are so many orders—there are 900-some orders on the Ninth Circuit website—some sort of typology that would allow somebody like Professor Hellman, who's trying to figure out how the courts are doing, would make a lot of sense.

That doesn't require a rule change, I don't think. It just requires organizing these orders in such a way that the many routine orders can be overlooked and let scholars and judges and others get to the orders that make a difference.

Now I commend the committee for posting on the judiciary's website what it calls a digest of authorities, which is a summation creating a sort of a common law for Federal judicial discipline that was recommended by the Breyer Committee, and I understand they're going to post that this summer. And that's a good step in the right direction.

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Mr. Wheeler.
Judge Scirica, I know you want to respond. Let me get to you later on. It is just my red light appears. Do you want to proceed now?

Judge Scirica. Yes, sir.

Mr. Coble. Go ahead, even though my red light is on, they won't penalize me too severely.

Judge Scirica. Thank you very much.

These are good suggestions, Mr. Chairman. And I think that we can accomplish these. Courts are moving toward putting all of their orders online, and there have been some additions just in the last month. And I think this is something we can do with dispatch.

[Pause.]

Mr. Coble. Were you finished, Judge?

Judge Scirica. Yes, sir.

Mr. Coble. I thank you for that.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Watt.

Mr. Watt. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And as has started to be my policy, I decided to generally defer to my co-counsel before I go and go last. So I think Mr. Jeffries was the first one here. So I will defer to him.

Mr. Jeffries. Well, thank you, Congressman Watt, and thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I thank the distinguished members of the panel and the two distinguished judges for your testimony.

This question is directed to either of the two distinguished members of the bench. As was pointed out in one of your presentations, the system of government that we have has been very strong and robust, 235 years, sets forth three coequal branches of government. An independent judiciary is clearly important in the context of the robustness of our democracy, us being a Nation of laws, not men.

What do you think is the appropriate role of congressional oversight, balancing the interests of our obligation as representatives of the people, direct representatives of the people, in the context of our democracy with the constitutional prescription of an independent judiciary that is a coequal branch of government?

Judge Sentelle. If I might, I can't give you a short answer on that. I think if you look back to 1701 to the Act of Settlement, the rider on that act that established the succession of the British crown created a judiciary that was protected in its tenure from removal and reduction in income by the king because the people of England had lost faith that the judges would take their cases and rule with justice against the crown.

In the time of the Declaration of Independence, the crown had violated that principle in the appointment of colonial judges so that, again, one of the grievances set forth in the Declaration of Independence is that the judges do not serve independently. They're under the thumb of the crown.

So the general principle would be that you need enough independence in the judiciary so that the public does not perceive that the political branches—and I use “political” not in a disparaging sense, but in the sense of the branches who are politically accountable—would not—are not controlling the independence of the judiciary.
Now that’s a very general answer, but I understand that Congress has to have the role of deciding are we spending the people’s money wisely, for example? And if we’re not, you need to find that out. You have to have oversight to find that out, and you have the responsibility of doing something about it.

If we are not obeying the laws that you have set forth, or if those laws are not properly managing what the courts are doing, then, of course, you have the responsibility as the representatives of the people to correct that.

Mr. JEFFRIES. With respect to, Judge, if I might—and I don’t generally get the opportunity to actually interrupt a judge. So I do it respectfully.

Mr. WATT. That is the prerogative of being in Congress now?

Mr. JEFFRIES. I am a new Member. So I am learning that prerogative. [Laughter.]

Thank you, Congressman.

With respect to the management of the people’s money, what has the impact of the sequestration cuts been, in your view, on the ability of the judiciary to provide for generally the efficiencies of its operation in the administration of justice? But specifically on this issue, how might it impact your capacity to provide for the type of self-governance that currently is the system that is in place?

Judge SENTELLE. Do you want that one? The impact of the sequestration on the judiciary is as broad as the judiciary is. Just as you see in the executive branch and in the legislative branch, every area is impacted.

We have clerk of courts offices that have people who are—either are or expecting to be furloughed, losing days a week. We have the problem in the defender system, which is funded through the courts that, actually, defender lawyers, as well as prosecutors over in the U.S. attorney’s office—that’s the Justice Department. But the defender lawyers are being furloughed so that we cannot hear—many districts cannot hear criminal trials but 4 days a week because of the furlough of the defender.

So that justice is being delayed in that regard and then will be denied. Because justice delayed is justice denied. So far as that affects the governance as such, Congressman, I’m not sure that I can say that I see a way in which it affects self-governance as such at this point.

But it affects us in a myriad of ways in that we can’t get our job done in a lot of ways as efficiently and as effectively as we’d like to do. The most disturbing to me is the effect on the defender system because you have the average defendant in Federal court now is in custody awaiting trial.

Now some of—all of those people are presumed to be innocent. Some of those people may be innocent. So that you have people who ultimately are acquitted who stayed in jail longer than they should have because the system could not get to their trial because the defenders had to be laid off a day a week.

Now that’s not directly governance, but perhaps you got somewhere close to what you were asking for.

Mr. JEFFRIES. Well, it certainly relates to the fair administration of justice within the system.

I thank you.
Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Mr. Jeffries.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Marino.

Mr. MARINO. Thank you, Chairman.

Good afternoon, gentlemen. It is a pleasure.

I am going to invoke what I learned from Justice—Judge Caputo and Judge Munley in the Third Circuit of Pennsylvania. “Tom, keep your questions short and make sure your witnesses keep their answers even shorter.”

So I am going to try and have each of you address this. So the question is—I will start with Professor Hellman. Sir, do you see any way, short of impeachment, any system by which Congress can investigate a particular Federal judge?

Mr. HELLMAN. I think that there are opportunities for investigating what the courts do. Investigating non-impeachable behavior I think would raise very troublesome questions under the Constitution.

If I understand your question correctly?

Mr. MARINO. Yes.

Mr. HELLMAN. Yes.

Mr. MARINO. Mr. Wheeler, please?

Mr. WHEELER. I have nothing to add to that. It's fairly rare that such occasions arise in which I think Congress might want to undertake that kind of investigation. But I think Professor Hellman is right that it would create problems fairly soon, especially when I think the judiciary is doing a pretty good job of taking care of itself.

Mr. MARINO. And if the judges concur with that, just nod, and I will go on to my next question unless you want to specifically address the issue.

Judge SCIRICA. I do concur. But let me just add a little footnote to that. If our disciplinary system is investigating a particular judge and we believe that that person may have committed a crime, we have an obligation to talk to the prosecutors about that and to make sure that nothing in our system is going to impede the proper prosecution of that particular individual.

So there is some relationship. There is some back and forth between the judiciary and, let's say, the U.S. attorney on some of these matters.

Mr. MARINO. Judge Sentelle, anything to add, sir?

Judge SENTELLE. I fear that if I talk, I'd subtract rather than add. I think everything has been well said, and I would simply do what's wise for a preacher sometimes to say amen and shut up.

Mr. MARINO. Hallelujah. I had—I practiced in the Third Circuit as a U.S. attorney and tried my cases before a distinguished court in the Middle District of Pennsylvania. And what advice or recommendations would you two judges give we in Congress about making the system more efficient and more equal for the American citizens?

Judge SCIRICA. If——

Judge SENTELLE. You backed off. You're asking what can Congress do to make the system more equal or more effective for the citizens?

Mr. MARINO. Yes.
Judge Sentelle. I’ll risk being a little controversial, I guess. For one thing, not long ago when we were wanting to have some additional bankruptcy judges to get bankruptcies handled, we were told we had to come up with the money. And it was suggested that we might get that by raising the fees in bankruptcy.

Raising of fees generates money perhaps, but part of what a government provides is an effective court system that is reasonably accessible to its citizens. And I think perhaps sometimes we’re asked to use fee levels to an extent that may make the system less equal by making it less accessible to the breadth of the citizenry.

That was a very small, esoteric, and perhaps controversial matter that comes to mind, but I believe that——

Mr. Marino. I happen to agree with you.

Judge Sentelle [continuing]. Pay as you go, PAYGO is not always a good way to approach the dispensation of justice.

Mr. Marino. Anything to add, Judge Scirica?

Judge Scirica. No, I do not.

Mr. Marino. Gentlemen, thank you very much.

And I yield back my time.

Mr. Coble. I thank the gentleman.

The Chair recognizes the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. Richmond.

Mr. Richmond. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you to the Ranking Member.

I am trying to separate what I remember regarding attorney discipline and judiciary discipline. Is there a database or does every circuit keep track of every complaint that is filed against a judge?

Judge Scirica. Yes.

Mr. Richmond. And the final disposition of each one of those becomes public?

Judge Scirica. Yes, sir.

Mr. Richmond. So there would be no instances of, for lack of a better description, a deferred adjudication for judges where there is a private letter of reprimand or something of that nature? That doesn’t exist on the Federal level?

Judge Scirica. There could be—there could be a private letter of reprimand where the judge’s name was not made public. Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Richmond. And in a sense of transparency and just, I guess, transparency, what is the purpose behind that?

Judge Scirica. Well, I think that if a private reprimand were issued, at least to me, it would be an indication that the matter had not been that serious. Perhaps it had been a one-time transgression, and perhaps it had not even hit the public eye.

I’ve—I was chief judge for 7 years, and I never issued a private reprimand or a private censure. And I think that it is pretty rare, but it certainly does happen. I think when matters are more serious, a public reprimand is called for, and in those instances, the judge’s name is made public.

Mr. Richmond. Do you think there is still a justifiable need or purpose served by having a private letter or private reprimand?

Judge Scirica. Well, I’ve often wondered about that myself. Because chief judges typically talk to judges who have gotten into trouble and counsel them, guide them, and sometimes end up taking action that's going to result in more serious—in more serious action, where there is an actual public reprimand or could result in a judge having cases suspended so that no cases would be sent to that judge for a period of time or, in the more serious instance, ask the judge to voluntarily resign.

Mr. RICHMOND. And Judge, please feel free to weigh in if you would like. It appears to me, especially with Federal judges because the likelihood of removal or the obstacles to get to removal are so great, the hurdles are so great, that removal is not usually the final outcome why there would be a need to keep it private.

When judges that are elected, then it can be used in campaigns and things of that nature. But a judge that is appointed basically for life, barring something very, very serious and our action, what is the public purpose of keeping any disciplinary action private would be my general question? And Judge, if you have more to add to it, please feel free, either judge.

Judge SENTELLE. Judge Scirica has more expertise on this than I. I think you make a very good point. There is a reason—now let me say at the outset, this may not be a good enough reason. But as Professor Hellman pointed out, the vast majority of the complaints that are filed are frivolous.

They're rather like some mail that you know that you get in all your congressional offices from somebody who thinks that the CIA is stealing their brainwaves. Well, these people think that because the judge has ruled against them, it must have been a conspiracy with some vast left or rightwing conspiracy against him.

And I think the sense is that we don't want to gratify those people by or aggrandize those people by publishing or publicizing the frivolous attacks on the judge. The other reason, and again, I don't know if it's good enough or not, is that if the complaint is not frivolous, but rather is scurrilous, that is it's false—it would be a legitimate complaint if it were true, but it's false—that again, we don't want to spread the slander.

Now it may not be that those are good enough reasons, but they are two reasons that are sometimes assigned.

Mr. RICHMOND. Well, with the complaint, I would tend to agree. But any private letter of discipline, I would—that is what I am having——

Judge SENTELLE. Private letter of discipline, I think you have a very good point. I was chief for 5 years. I never issued a private letter of discipline, but I did on one occasion take other remedial action with a judge when there was a legitimate complaint that he just wasn't getting his work out. And I went and met with him and tried to help him come up with ways to get his work out.

I did not enter any kind of order that went on the public record on that, but as far as an actual reprimand privately, I haven't done it. But I know that shortly before I came onto the court, which was 1987, there had been a private reprimand issued against a judge. And since the complainant has a right to know what happened to his complaint, he knew about it. And so, the complainant actually made it public.

The judge was irate, said these are supposed to be confidential. And we—by then I was on the court, and we said, look, we can't
If there's a reprimand there and the complainant knows it, they could make it public. And I don't know that there is a very good reason for not making it public to begin with.

Mr. Richmond. Thank you, Judge.

And thank you, Mr. Chair.

Mr. Coble. Thank you, Mr. Richmond.

The gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Holding, is recognized.

Mr. Holding. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge Sentelle, it is always a pleasure to see you. Judge Scirica, your reputation precedes you, and it is a pleasure to meet you.

I would point out, as a matter of trivia, that the Chairman, the Vice Chairman, Judge Sentelle, and myself all served as assistant United States attorneys at one point or another, and there might be some other Members of the Committee who did so as well. So my question harkens back from that experience.

I guess there are 93 Federal districts, and each one has their own local rules and local traditions of practice. In some of those Federal districts where colleagues of mine were serving as U.S. attorneys, they had a pervasive problem with frivolous complaints about ethics or prosecutorial misconduct. And the way the Department of Justice worked with the Office of Professional Responsibility that whenever one of these complaints would go in, it would go up to main Justice and trigger an investigation and a process which was kind of a one-size-fits-all process that could be very onerous, and it could put an assistant United States attorney out of commission for a long time complying with the investigation.

Oftentimes, they were found to be trivial, but it is a one-size-fits-all investigation. So my question is, is anything being contemplated here, change wise, that would foster a situation where those types of compliance could become burdensome on the judiciary?

Judge Scirica?

Judge Scirica. I don't—yes. I don't think so. I think that all of these complaints are taking—taken seriously. Ninety-five percent of the complaints on an annual basis are filed by either prisoners or by pro se litigants in civil cases.

And as Judge Sentelle mentioned, most of them allege some form of corruption or collusion or bias, but without any facts, without any reference to the record, or anything that can be checked. And when you read the complaints, you see that folks are angry or upset because of the result in the case, because they may be serving a long prison term, or some are just mentally ill and they can't let go of a loss or of a prison sentence.

I think the system does pretty well. Sometimes we do get abusive complaints. That is serial complaints from the same individual. When that happens, after a period of time, we have show cause orders that work in order to prevent them from filing more complaints.

But in our circuit, we take the complaints and—but we have to approve the filing. That is we review it before we allow the complaint to go ahead if somebody has filed several complaints.

I don't think there's any real effective sanction that you can impose on these individuals. Most of them don't have money. Many don't have jobs. Many are in prison. And, but each one is entitled to have his or her complaint heard, and that is what is done.

The fact that there are so few complaints that reach a special committee and reach my committee, which is in some degrees the end of the road, I think is pretty good evidence that the Federal judges are doing their jobs properly, that the great majority of these complaints are not founded. But they all get a hearing, and they're dealt with, I think, appropriately.

Mr. HOLDING. Thank you.

Professor Hellman, I want to follow up quickly on Mr. Marino's question. I think we are all in agreement that it would be difficult for Congress to do non-impeachment hearings of Federal judges. But what about in the instance—there are 93 Federal districts. They have local rules.

What about investigations of local rules in particular districts? For instance, you might have a district that has local rules that cause a litigation outcome or a litigation process that is different from any other district in the United States and, as such, is a magnet for a particular type of litigation.

What would the proper role of Congress be in looking at that from an oversight perspective?

Mr. HELLMAN. One of the things——

Mr. COBLE. Mike?

Mr. HELLMAN. One of the things Congress certainly has control over is venue, where suits can be brought. And in fact, Congress has from time to time changed the venue statutes when it has felt that people were using particular districts as a magnet for litigation that didn't necessarily belong there.

But the other thing I would say is that a separate process of the Judicial Conference is the review of the rules made by the districts for litigation. And I think that probably the first step if there are concerns about local rules that are inconsistent from one district to another is to bring that to the attention of the Rules Advisory Committee because they play a very active role in trying to bring uniformity to the procedures in the various Federal courts.

Mr. HOLDING. Thank you, Professor.

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Mr. Holding.

The Chair recognizes the gentlelady from Texas, Ms. Jackson Lee.

Ms. JACKSON LEE. Thank the Chair and the Ranking Member. Thank the witnesses very much. Good to see you, Judge and professors.

I am going to ask a specific question, then go into a policy question that I hope you all will just comment on. The specific question deals with the 2008, the judiciary rules included a strong provision that prohibited a chief judge who had entered a final order from participating in any subsequent consideration of a petition for review of that order by the Judicial Council.

That policy provided an assurance to the petitioner that the decision of the Judicial Council would not be unduly influenced by the chief judge who had already rendered an order. And in the 2008 national rules, the policy was completely reversed, and the judiciary provided, to my understanding, no explanation in doing so.

The two judges, would you comment on that?
Judge Scirica. Yes. You are certainly correct. The rules changed the prior practice that was set forth in what were called the illustrative rules. And the reason, I think, was because it was decided that this process should be mainly an inquisitorial or an administrative process.

Obviously, there is some adversarial nature to it, but it should be more in the nature of an inquisitorial process to try to get at the facts. And for the judge who is directing the investigation making certain findings, making references to a special committee, for example, dealing or sitting on the council, it was thought that they could play both roles.

And, but let me say that I think that is a—that is a legitimate and fair criticism of the rules now, and as a matter of fact, I can tell you that some circuit chiefs on their own have disqualified themselves under the disqualification provision in the rules. That they choose not to sit when the matter is being reviewed by the circuit council, and this is something that we can take up as well.

Ms. Jackson Lee. I would encourage that, and I appreciate the comment, Judge.

Judge? Judge Sentelle. Well, before I begin my direct answer, I've connected with all the North Carolina Members on the panel, and I would say that you and I have a connection that I'm sure you're not aware of, in that my daughter is a professor at the University of Houston.

Ms. Jackson Lee. Very much have a connection. Thank you. We very much have a connection. I hope they are treating you well. One of the great schools of this Nation.

Judge Sentelle. I would pretty much echo what Judge Scirica said. I had never thought about the chief judge passing on the matter that he had just passed on until I became chief judge. And although it is the case that nearly all of these complaints are frivolous and valueless, it still seemed to me more than passing strange that I was receiving a vote sheet on our computerized program to vote to affirm or reverse or vacate my own decision.

Ms. Jackson Lee. Your own decision, yes.

Judge Sentelle. I think you're raising a very legitimate concern there.

Ms. Jackson Lee. And I thank you for that, and if we can leave that matter open, I think the judges were forthright in their assessment. And that is the thought as I had raised this question of the potential conflict and/or bias, not determined biased.

I am going to now ask some policy questions, and I would appreciate it if you both, the professor and Mr. Wheeler, along with our judges. Just a broad issue on judicial discretion. Of course, we have mandatory sentencing in some aspects of the court. But have we so restrained the court that discretion now—and when I think of discretion, I think of mercy—is not a viable option.

And I give as an example, this was a case dealing generically with alleged Medicare fraud. This is pervasively dealing with African-American doctors and an individual who was tried. The court said, “And I am going to make an example out of you.”
Now Members of Congress sit at this dais and say a lot of things, but I wonder how that relates to justice? And just quickly, I would appreciate what do you think the number of vacancies we have on the Federal bench does to justice?

Mr. HELLMAN. Mr. Wheeler is the expert on vacancies. So he can give us some information about that.

Mr. WHEELER. Well, the vacancy rate now you know is around 10 percent. It's more serious in some districts than it is in others. In your home State, for example, I think there are six vacancies.

Ms. JACKSON LEE. Very serious, yes.

Mr. WHEELER. And in a State that's dealing with an overload of immigration and border crossing litigation. So I think some courts can handle the vacancies. There's always going to be a few vacancies. I think at 10 percent, it's pretty serious.

And it's not the House's responsibility, but I think both the White House and the Senate have some work to do. I can't say anything much more beyond that.

Ms. JACKSON LEE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

If I can get my other answer, if any of the witnesses would care to—care to answer the policy question on discretion maybe in writing if my time is——

Mr. MARINO [presiding]. Without objection.

Ms. JACKSON LEE. Thank you.

Mr. MARINO. The Chair now recognizes the Ranking Member, Congressman Watt.

Mr. WATT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank all of my colleagues for their excellent questions. I generally try to go last because a lot of times they have other obligations and need to leave, and as the Ranking Member, I am kind of obligated to be here whether I need to leave or not. So, and they clean up a lot of interesting issues that I don't have to deal with.

Judges Scirica and Sentelle, Professor Hellman, and by affirmative Mr. Wheeler have made a number of suggestions for us moving forward. I am wondering whether there are any of those suggestions to which you react either overwhelmingly favorably or, even more important, probably overwhelmingly unfavorably? And so, that would be my first question.

I am particularly interested, I think, in—not that I am not interested in the rest of Professor Hellman's recommendations, but I am especially interested in the area that might be a little bit more controversial, and that is with respect to recusal of judges, which in my experience has been an area in which judges have tended to want to have less outside involvement than their own particular judgment about whether they have a conflict, perceived or real, or not.

So if you all could address whether you have any particular negative or countervailing—maybe not negative responses to what Professor Hellman is—but maybe some countervailing arguments on the other side of what he has suggested might be a more appropriate way to frame the question.

Judge Scirica. Well, recusal has always been a matter that is handled on direct appeal. It is part of the merits of the case. That is not to say that certain conduct might not also constitute judicial misconduct and could, in effect, be prosecuted under both the Misconduct Act and the rules we have before us.

If the judge, for example, exhibited some bias toward an individual or toward a group of people, or acted in a certain way that really was offensive in a certain manner, that person might very well be subject to a misconduct complaint, as well as to a direct appeal, because that individual did not recuse.

So I'm not sure that I completely understand the thrust of Professor Hellman's remarks in this area, but it seems to me that the system now is working quite well. People can even take interlocutory appeals on recusal issues during the pendency of a case. And I probably handle one of these a month, if not—if not more. And sometimes we grant them during the course of pendency of the action.

Mr. WATT. Judge Sentelle?

Judge S ENTELLE. In common with Judge Scirica, I'm not sure that I'm fully understanding the thrust of Professor Hellman's point. I don't see that there is a great problem that needs to be fixed. Maybe there is, but I'm not seeing it at this point.

We get apparently a good deal less recusal litigation than does the Third Circuit because I rarely see one, and I don't think I would know——

Mr. WATT. Well, I think I am more concerned about the litigation aspects of it than the appearance aspects of it, and I would expand the question perhaps to include some appearances that are taking place on the Supreme Court, which—from which there can be no appeal, where there appear to be financial interests.

And so, what do we do in that situation, I guess, is—and Professor Hellman, if you care to weigh in to clarify your suggestions in this area, I think the Chair would grant me a minute or two——

Mr. MARINO. Most definitely.

Mr. HELLMAN. Thank you, Mr. Watt. I appreciate that.

Actually, I have made no suggestions about changing the handling of disqualification motions in the district courts. I raised the question whether the current rule—which is that judicial disqualification decisions can never be the subject of a misconduct complaint unless there's a real pattern or unless there is a bad motive—I raised the question whether that should be reconsidered.

My suggestions about disqualification and recusal relate solely to the misconduct process itself, and the suggestion I made is that in the misconduct process itself, judges should follow the same rules that they do in litigation, namely they should disqualify themselves and should be required to disqualify themselves whenever their impartiality could reasonably be questioned.

Right now, what the rule says, the judge, in his or her discretion, decides whether he or she should recuse. That's it. I think the Section 455 standard should be applied in misconduct proceedings. That's the only suggestion I made on that specific point.

Mr. WATT. Responses?

Judge SCIRICA. Very shortly, I've always believed that in certain circumstances a judge could run afoul of the recusal statute and the Misconduct Act at the same time. There can be overlap. And just because it's a recusal motion does not necessarily mean that a misconduct complaint, a valid misconduct complaint, might not lie.

Mr. Watt. So are you suggesting perhaps some clarification on that might be appropriate?

Judge Scirica. Well, I always thought it was completely clear, and I've applied it that way.

Judge Sentelle. Yes, I'm thinking of an example, Congressman, with respect to where a judge's failure to recuse could be the subject of a misconduct complaint but was not directly appealed. Anybody can bring the misconduct complaint. You don't have to be a party to the lawsuit.

If you're in the court and you see the judge committing misconduct, you can complain about it without being a party to the lawsuit. So that a person not—you don't have to have standing like you do in an Article III proceeding. So that a person not a party to the lawsuit might see the lawsuit settle after she had seen the judge commit some gross act of failure to recuse, could still come in and make the complaint to the chief. And the chief could still take action as judicial misconduct.

Now the broader principle of what Professor Hellman is saying, as far as making it plain how the judges should recuse in the misconduct proceedings, I don't find troubling.

Mr. Watt. Could I just ask one more question, Mr. Chairman? Just to clarify what happens in the Supreme Court now. There is no appeals process there. Do they have an internal process for kind of ferreting out potential appearances of conflicts, or is it solely in the discretion of a member of that high court whether to disqualify or recuse one's self from a case?

Judge Scirica. I certainly don't want to speak on behalf of the Court, but the Court has said that it looks to the Code of Conduct that applies to all Federal judges. It looks to precedent. It looks to other treatises. They—like other judges—they may discuss these matters amongst themselves.

They feel that these are the sources from which they have to derive guidance, and so I think that just like with us, that an individual judge decides whether or not he or she should recuse under a certain circumstance. And that is subject to review.

Mr. Watt. I appreciate the response. I want to make it clear on the record that I am not questioning any particular decision that has been made by any of the Supreme Court Justices. We are just trying to see whether there might be some other process.

Mr. Wheeler, did you have a point to make on that?

Mr. Wheeler. Well, just very briefly, there was, as you may know, a bill introduced last year in the House that would have tried to regulate that. And I can certainly understand the frustration of some Members about some of the behavior they observed.

But I think this may well be an area in which you just have to live with the results, that any kind of legislation is going to do more damage than putting up with the occasional instance in which a justice, whomever it may be, perhaps does something that raises the eyebrows.

Mr. Watt. I thank the Chairman for his—yield back.

Mr. Marino. I believe that Congressman Holding would like to be recognized for a moment?
Mr. HOLDING. I want to thank the witnesses very much. And Judge Sentelle, as I said, it is always a pleasure to see you. I will be with Judge Whitney this evening, and I will convey your regards to him.

I am going to submit a question to the record to flesh out a bit more on the local rules and review of local rules because it is something that interests me.

So thank you all very much. I yield back.

Mr. MARINO. The Chair recognizes the Chairman.

Mr. COBLE. I also want to express my thanks to the panel. We appreciate you all being here, and we will do—we will plow this field again, I am sure.

Yield back.

Mr. MARINO. Thank you.

This concludes today’s hearing. I want to thank all of our witnesses for attending. I would like to thank also the people in the audience for being here as well.

Without objection, all Members will have 5 legislative days to submit additional written questions for the witnesses or additional materials for the record.

Again, gentlemen, thank you very much.

This hearing is adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 3:26 p.m., the Subcommittee was adjourned.]

“AN EXAMINATION OF THE FEDERAL JUDICIAL CONDUCT AND DISABILITY PROCESS”

April 25, 2013

1. The Eastern District of Texas ("District") is well-known as an attractive venue for plaintiffs in patent infringement cases, and particularly for patent assertion entities, or "patent trolls." While the America Invents Act of 2011 successfully impeded patent trolls’ activities in many courts, these cases still thrive in the District. This is due in part to the fact that the District waits to examine whether venue is proper until much of the litigation has already occurred. The District then claims that it would be improper to change venue so late in the litigation and allows the ease to proceed. Thus, the District’s unique local rules and practices encourage abusive patent litigation.

As we are discussing today, Congress has some authority to oversee the activities of the Judiciary. What role can Congress play in reviewing and regulating the various districts’ local rules? Does it have the power to enact legislation to that end?

Brief response: Congress has extensive authority to review and regulate the various districts’ local rules, and it has considerable power to enact legislation to address perceived abuses in the administration of the rules and the handling of litigation.

Additional comments: First, venue is a matter entirely within the control of Congress. For example, in the Federal Courts Jurisdiction and Venue Clarification Act of 2011, Pub. L. No. 112-63, Congress substantially revised the law governing venue in the federal courts. Congress can certainly make further revisions, including measures specific to 28 U.S.C. § 1400, the patent venue statute.

Concern about abuse of venue in the Eastern District of Texas is long-standing. Some earlier versions of the bill that became the America Invents Act of 2011 (AIA) included provisions designed to curb these abuses. Indeed, at various times during the AIA’s lengthy gestation period I worked with some of the stakeholders in writing a venue provision for the bill. But we were never able to get a consensus, and eventually the provision was dropped entirely. In part, this was because a series of mandamus rulings by the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit had cut back on abuse of venue in the Eastern District of Texas. However, if Congress thinks that abuses have continued, it can make a fresh start on writing patent venue legislation.

Second, Congress has acted in 28 U.S.C. § 2071 to control local rule-making power, and it could certainly add additional restrictions. In addition, if Congress believes that particular rules or practices in some judicial districts have resulted in abuses, Congress can enact legislation to require a different approach nationally. For example, as part of the AIA, Congress added a new statutory provision on joinder of parties in patent cases. The statute overrides not only local rules but also the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.
